The Children's Law Center of Massachusetts (CLCM), a private non-profit legal services agency located in Lynn, Massachusetts since 1977, annually provides legal representation to more than 500 children and youth in child welfare, juvenile justice and education matters. The CLCM works to improve outcomes for at-risk youth through trial and appellate advocacy, outreach, and research and policy initiatives.

I. Executive Summary.

To ensure the safety of children charged with delinquent behavior, the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, 42 U.S.C. § 5633(a)(12), prohibits the detention of recently arrested youth in police stations for more than 6 hours. It requires that those held longer be housed separately from adult arrestees. Because most Massachusetts police departments do not have, and lack the resources to create, separate juvenile lock-up facilities, the Commonwealth has established Alternative Lock-up Programs (ALPs), free-standing juvenile detention facilities that serve multiple police departments.

Although the federal requirement has been in force for years, the ALP system is, at best, haphazard and ad-hoc. At present, the state's child welfare agency, the Massachusetts Department of Children and Families (DCF) (formerly the Department of Social Services), and the Massachusetts Executive Office of Public Safety and Security (EOPSS) each contract with 4 different service providers to operate non-secure and hardware secure facilities, respectively. The law governing the detention decision-making process and the guidelines regarding the placement of youth in non-secure versus secure facilities are ambiguous, poorly defined, or ignored, resulting in the unnecessary secure detention of youth who should be awaiting arraignment at home.

While conditions at the non-secure facilities are subject to relatively rigorous regulation and oversight, those at the EOPSS ALPs are not. Among other things, EOPSS does not mandate on-going staff training; policies and procedures regarding behavior management and the use of restraints; assessments of youth entering its facilities for medical and mental health problems; or licensure by the state agency responsible for licensing residential juvenile facilities. At times, some secure facilities have operated without showers; without recreational activities, without a sufficient number of staff, and without female guards for female detainees.

Massachusetts law presumes that children arrested when court is not in session shall be released to an adult who can guarantee their subsequent appearance in court. Although it allows arresting police departments to detain a child, they may only do so if the child is 14 years of age or older and he was arrested pursuant to a warrant authorizing his detention or a local probation officer directed that he be detained. Because the statute sets forth no standards to guide probation officers in this decision, substantial numbers of children who might otherwise be released are detained, including children under the age of 14 and a disproportionate number of youth of color. Youth of color account for between 20 and 25% of the adolescents residing in the Commonwealth, but account for more than 60% of all children detained in the EOPSS ALPs.

The unnecessary detention of juvenile arrestees could be reduced if the children were readily afforded access to bail magistrates—state officials authorized to set bail when courts are not open. Massachusetts law guarantees arrested youth the same right to bail as adults. Arresting police departments, however, often neglect to contact bail magistrates and some bail magistrates are reportedly unwilling to make bail determinations for children. To remedy these problems, the Commonwealth's Bail Administrator recently launched a campaign to better educate police officers, local juvenile probation officers and bail magistrates about the right of juveniles to bail.

Although EOPSS officials have claimed that its ALPs are intended for “serious and violent delinquents,” recent data show that approximately half of those detained are charged with misdemeanors such as simple assault and battery, minor drug-related offenses, disorderly conduct, resisting arrest, disturbing a school classroom, violating a city ordinance, trespassing, vandalism, or malicious destruction of property.

Because of EOPSS’s failure to provide consistent oversight, two of its contractors are not licensed to operate an ALP. State law requires that any entity administering a program that provides care to one or more children on a 24-hour a day basis, including those that do so at the request of law enforcement agencies, must have a residential child care license from the Massachusetts Department of Early Education and Care to ensure the safety of the facility, the adequacy of staff and the observance of the rights of the children and their families. All non-secure ALP contractors and three secure ALP contractors are licensed. The two that are not have been housing children for at least four years.

Funding of the EOPSS ALPs remains a major problem. At present, the secure facilities are funded solely with federal grants from the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) intended to support programs to reduce detention and prevent recidivism. As a result of the Commonwealth’s continued reliance on the grants to fund detention facilities, there is little federal money available for programs to keep youth out of such facilities. Moreover, because the amount of the federal grants has decreased so significantly over the last 10 years, there is growing concern that within the next one or two years, the grants will no longer be sufficient to support the secure ALPs.

To address these problems, the American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU of Massachusetts and the Children’s Law Center of Massachusetts recommend that the Commonwealth clarify the circumstances under which youth may be detained between arrest and arraignment and delegate administration of all secure ALPs to the Massachusetts Department of Youth Services (DYS). More specifically, we recommend that the Commonwealth adopt measures to ensure that: (1) detention is limited to youth who are at risk of flight or whose release would endanger their communities, (2) access to bail or prompt immediate arraignment is readily available to all juvenile arrestees, (3) children 13 years of age or under are not detained in hardware secure facilities, and (4) pre-arraignment detention is incorporated into Massachusetts’ Juvenile Detention Alternatives Initiative, an effort spearheaded by DHS to reduce juvenile post-arraignment detention. Finally, the Commonwealth should plan for the orderly transition from dependence on federal funds to support the ALP system.

II. Background: Massachusetts' System for Securely Detaining Children between Arrest and Arraignment is in Need of Reform.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been known historically as a forerunner in innovative and rehabilitative juvenile justice. Unfortunately, that reputation may no longer be deserved. According to the 2006 report, Do You Know Where The Children Are? A Report on Massachusetts Youth Unlawfully Held Without Bail,¹ hundreds of youth accused of delinquent behavior are unnecessarily detained after arrest and prior to arraignment in secure Alternative Lock-Up Programs (ALPs). Data obtained through the Massachusetts Public Records Act and interviews with police officers, state administrators and advocates reveal that the Commonwealth has taken few steps to remedy this problem.

Children arrested while the Massachusetts Juvenile Court is in session are typically taken by the arresting police officers to the police station to be booked and then to the Court to be arraigned before a judge. As previously stated, state law presumes that children arrested while the Court is not in session will be released by the arresting officers to an adult who can guarantee their return to the Court. It provides, however, that children 14 year of age or older, arrested pursuant to a warrant authorizing their detention or ordered detained by a local probation officer, and ineligible for or unable to post bail, may be held by the arresting officer until court reopens.²

According to the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act (JJDP), detained children may be housed initially in adult jails or lock-up facilities but after six hours must be moved to juvenile-specific facilities.³ Until July 2008, the Boston Police Department was the only Massachusetts police department to have its own juvenile detention facility. To assist the Commonwealth's remaining 350 police departments in complying with the 6-hour rule, EOPSS, the state entity responsible for Massachusetts' compliance with the JJDP, created a network of hardware secure and non-secure juvenile ALPs, all of which are currently managed on a day-to-day basis by third-party contractors.⁴ The Department of Children and Families oversees the non-secure ALP contracts and EOPSS administers the secure ALP contracts. For the last several years, the EOPSS contractors have included the Key Program, Inc., the Bristol County Sheriff's Office, the Essex County Sheriff's Office, and the Center for Human Development, Inc.

With respect to the EOPSS ALPs, Do You Know Where The Children Are? found that:

- Probation officers' decisions to securely detain were often cursory and ill-informed;
- Many probation officers ordered the secure detention of youth 13 years of age or younger, in violation of state law;
- Few police departments provided securely detained youth with access to bail magistrates, in violation of state law;
- Many bail magistrates refused to set bail for youth;
- Youth of color were disproportionately securely detained; and
- Two of EOPSS contractors—the Essex and Bristol County Sheriffs' Offices—were not licensed to operate ALPs by the Massachusetts Department of Early Education and Care.⁵

On July 1, 2008, with little advanced notice, the Boston Police Department closed its detention facility for budgetary reasons, throwing the entire ALP system into chaos. Many children arrested by the Boston Police Department who previously would have been detained in that facility were suddenly transported to ALPs that did not have the capacity to accommodate them and to which parents without cars could not travel to post bail.⁶

The Commonwealth must take immediate steps to rectify the ALP situation. As the data analyzed herein makes clear, returning to the status quo by financing a new detention facility in the Boston area would be unacceptable.

III. Probation Officers' Unfettered Discretion Results in the Detention of Too Many Children Who Should Be Awaiting Arraignment in Their Homes.

National and international standards recommend that secure detention should be limited to youth who are at high risk of re-offending or failing to return to court. Although Massachusetts law limits the detention of youth at arraignment to those who are at risk of flight,⁷ whose release would endanger their communities,⁸ or who are in need of a mental health evaluation to assist with the adjudication of their cases,⁹ it is silent on the standard to be used by probation officers in deciding whom to detain prior to arraignment. In 2006, according to at least one local probation officer, the Office of the Commissioner of Probation had written guidelines but would not make them public.¹⁰ In 2008, the Office claimed to be revising a form for probation officers to use when making detention decisions and stated that it could not be released to the public until it had been finalized.¹¹

During each of the last four years, the Commonwealth has detained more than 2000 youth in EOPSS ALPs.

As Table 2 demonstrates, in 2007, the majority of these youth came from just 20 of the approximately 350 police departments for which the EOPSS ALPs were created.

Table 1.¹²
Number of Youth Detained Prior to Arraignment – 2004 to 2007

As illustrated in Table 3, in 2007, the most recent calendar year for which such data is available, an estimated one quarter of the EOPSS youth were held at the direction of local probation officers, who, because of ambiguities in the law and the unwillingness of the Office of the Commissioner of Probation to make its guidelines public, appeared to exercise unfettered discretion when deciding whom to detain.

According to police officers, probation officers' decisions to detain are generally based on the charges against the child and the child's prior involvement with the juvenile justice system. Probation officers rarely see or speak with the child or the child's parents or family members prior to making the determination and do not appear to engage in any other type of meaningful analysis that would permit them to determine whether a youth is at risk of flight or a danger to himself or others.

IV. Approximately Half of All Securely Detained Children Have Been Charged With Minor Offenses.

Until 2008, EOPSS claimed that its secure ALPs were intended for “pre-arraigned serious and violent delinquents.”¹⁵ According to a chart prepared early on by EOPSS and reproduced as Table 4 below, children charged with misdemeanors who could not return home because a parent or other responsible adult could not be located or would not come forward were to be housed in non-secure facilities. Yet, Department of Children and Families contractors often refused to accept children referred to them. Between 2006 and early 2008 for example, non-secure ALPs in the western part of the Commonwealth would not place any youth arrested in connection with a domestic dispute or pursuant to a default warrant, regardless of the underlying facts.¹⁶

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

In an effort to clarify the circumstances under which children charged with low-level offenses were to be placed in non-secure facilities, Department of Children and Families (DCF) and EOPSS recently produced a second placement guideline, reproduced as Table 5 below. Unlike its predecessor, this chart officially permits non-secure contractors to reject children charged with minor offenses.

Although EOPSS requires that its contractors track the offenses with which detainees are charged, the contractors do not record this data in a uniform manner. Each uses its own abbreviations and codes, making it almost impossible to determine with any precision the total number of youth charged with any particular type of offense. A review of 2007 data,

V. Children 13 Years of Age and Younger Are Being Securely Detained Unlawfully.

According to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, laws limiting individual freedoms must be “strictly construed” to ensure that “individuals are not deprived of liberty without a clear statement of legislative intent to do so.”²⁰ Section 67 of Chapter 119 of the Massachusetts General Laws permits police departments to detain “a child between seven and seventeen years of age arrested with or without a warrant” while a police officer contacts the local probation officer and the child’s parent or guardian or an individual with whom the child resides. It permits the continued detention of youth after such contact under the circumstances set forth earlier in this report, but only if the “child [is] between fourteen and seventeen years of age.”²¹ It makes no mention of the continued detention of children under the age of 14.

Thus, if section 67 is strictly construed, it does not permit the continued detention of children 13 years of age or younger after the relevant notification. Yet, during each of the last four years, approximately 10% of the youth securely detained in EOPSS facilities have been 13 years of age or younger. In 2005, 18 youth securely detained in EOPSS facilities were 11 years old. In 2006, four 10-year-olds were securely detained.

VI. Massachusetts Youth Are Being Denied Their Statutory Right to Bail.

Massachusetts law provides youth with the same right to bail as adults.²³ Once a probation officer directs that a child should be detained, state law requires the arresting police department to provide the child with access to a bail magistrate. Bail magistrates are authorized to hold bail hearings in jails and police stations to determine whether the posting of a cash bond will increase the likelihood of a child's return to court. If, after examining a number of factors set forth in state law, the magistrate determines that it will, the magistrate may set bail. If the youth's family is able to post bail, he must be released.²⁴

In 2007, police departments failed to provide more than 300 of the 2233 youth detained in EOPSS facilities with access to a bail magistrate. Most of these police departments were located in Hampden County; few, if any, had "a system for after hours bail setting."²⁵

Although all bail magistrates must respond promptly to requests for their services,²⁶ police officers report that they have not always done so. The officers state that some bail magistrates have refused to respond, believing that they would not be compensated for their efforts. Under the system currently in place, bail magistrates receive $40 per person for their services but only if the person actually posts bail. They are not compensated if the person does not post bail.²⁷ Unlike adults who can post their own bail, young people are dependent on their parents or guardians to post bail. If the parent or guardian refuses to do so after bail has been set, the magistrate does not receive $40.

In mid-2008, the Commonwealth's Bail Administrator, Michael McEneaney, launched an extensive educational campaign to remedy some of these deficiencies. Among other things, he has reached out to chiefs of police and juvenile probation officers to inform them of the need to provide youth with access to bail magistrates, and is preparing a comprehensive memorandum for bail magistrates.²⁸ possible to determine whether youth of color are detained in greater proportions because they are arrested in greater proportions. Although minority youth comprise a majority of the adolescent population in the cities of Lawrence and Springfield, they comprise less than half of the adolescent population in Worcester and Lynn.³¹

Youth of color are disproportionately represented in the EOPSS ALPs. In 2007, they accounted for roughly 20% of the adolescent population in the area served by those ALPs (i.e., all counties but Suffolk County),²⁹ but more than 60% of youth detained in the ALPs.

A small number of police departments were primarily responsible for this disparity. As set forth in Table 9 below, over 80% of the youth detained by each of the Holyoke, Lawrence, Lynn, Springfield and Worcester Police Departments were youth of color. Because most police departments do not maintain juvenile arrest data by ethnicity, it is im-

VIII. EOPSS Has Failed to Mandate the Licensure of Two of its Secure Facilities, Resulting in Inadequate Care.

State law requires that entities operating temporary shelter care facilities must have a residential child care license from the Massachusetts Department of Early Education and Care.³³ It defines a temporary shelter facility as:

Any facility which operates to receive children under 18 years of age for temporary shelter care during the day or night when such children request shelter therein, or when such children are placed there by a placement agency, a parent, a law enforcement agency, or a court with authority to make such placement. Temporary shelter facility shall not mean family foster care or a group care facility, a police station or a town lockup.³⁴

Under this definition, the EOPSS ALPs qualify as temporary shelter facilities. They are designed to temporarily house children at the request of law enforcement agencies.

That two EOPSS contractors are sheriff's offices does not make their ALPs police stations or town lockups. The sheriffs' offices bid for the secure ALP contracts in the same manner as the three other secure providers; they are subjected to the same contract policies, provisions and rules as the three other providers; and like the three other providers, they house children from dozens of surrounding police departments.³⁵ Unlike the three other contractors, however, the sheriffs' offices are not licensed by the Department of Early Education and Care and never have been.³⁶

In 2000, members of the Juvenile Justice Advisory Committee, a group appointed by the Governor to advise the Commonwealth on how to spend the federal funds it receives pursuant to the federal Juvenile Justice Delinquency and Prevention Act, questioned the fact that the Bristol County Sheriffs' Office, which had been awarded an ALP contract in 1999,³⁷ was not licensed and had no plans to obtain a license. In response, EOPSS stated that it would seek a legal opinion to determine whether a license was necessary.³⁸ According to EOPSS's General Counsel, no such opinion was ever rendered.³⁹

Licensed facilities must meet Department of Early Education and Care regulations concerning, among other things: (1) admissions policies and procedures; (2) the physical condition of the facilities; (3) staffing; (4) the types of services provided; (5) behavior management techniques; (6) the rights and responsibilities of parents, children and staff; and (7) organization, financing and administration.⁴⁰ The sheriffs' offices have not always met these standards.

The regulations prohibit licensed contractors from requiring youth to wear clothing that identifies them as coming from a residential facility.⁴¹ Youth detained at the Bristol ALP are currently required to wear white and black striped prison clothing.⁴²

The regulations require licensed contractors to have a staff-to-youth ratio appropriate to the age, capabilities and needs of the children.⁴³ In 2007, EOPSS noted that the Bristol County Sheriffs' Office did not have sufficient staff on site.⁴⁴

Licensed contractors must have gender-appropriate staff.⁴⁵ The Essex County Sheriffs' Office frequently relies on off-duty police officers to serve as staff and at times has been unable to find female officers when girls have been detained.⁴⁶

Licensed contractors must have trained staff.⁴⁷ In reviewing applications for ALPs in 2006, members of the Juvenile Justice Advisory Committee expressed concern that staff employed by the Essex County Sheriff's Office "may not be aware of what they need to do as an ALP" and acknowledged that "Essex staff have minimal training."⁴⁹

Licensed contractors must maintain their facilities in a sanitary condition, with at least one tub or shower for every six residents.⁵⁰ In 2005, the Essex ALP, a double-wide trailer outside the building housing the Essex County Sheriff's Office, had no shower or tub. A shower was later installed, but in 2006, members of the Juvenile Justice Advisory Committee raised concerns about the "quality of care" at the ALP, noting that "the 'trailer' is not an ideal facility."⁵¹

Licensed contractors must maintain their facilities in a safe condition.⁵² In 2007 and again in 2008, EOPSS recommended to the Essex County Sheriff's Office that it take steps to secure the perimeter of the trailer to prevent escapes and that it increase bed-checks to ensure the safety of the youth detained.⁵³ In mid-2008, a young man disappeared from the Essex ALP, purportedly by crawling out of one of the trailer's heating ducts. He was later found at his home.⁵⁴

Licensed contractors must use approved behavior management techniques and policies and procedures governing the use of restraints.⁵⁵ In 2007, the Bristol County Sheriff's Office designated a stool affixed to the floor of a bedroom in its ALP as a behavior management tool; poorly behaved children were to be handcuffed to the stool. The Bristol County Sheriff's Office contends that it never used the stool.⁵⁶

The oversight provided by EOPSS in lieu of licensing is minimal. It inspects each facility yearly or as needed, and makes recommendations as it deems necessary. While it has suggested to the unlicensed contractors training, staffing ratios, intake procedures and recreational activities, it does not mandate its recommendations and the Essex County Sheriff's Office has done little to implement them.⁵⁷

IX. Mechanisms for Funding the ALPs are Inadequate.

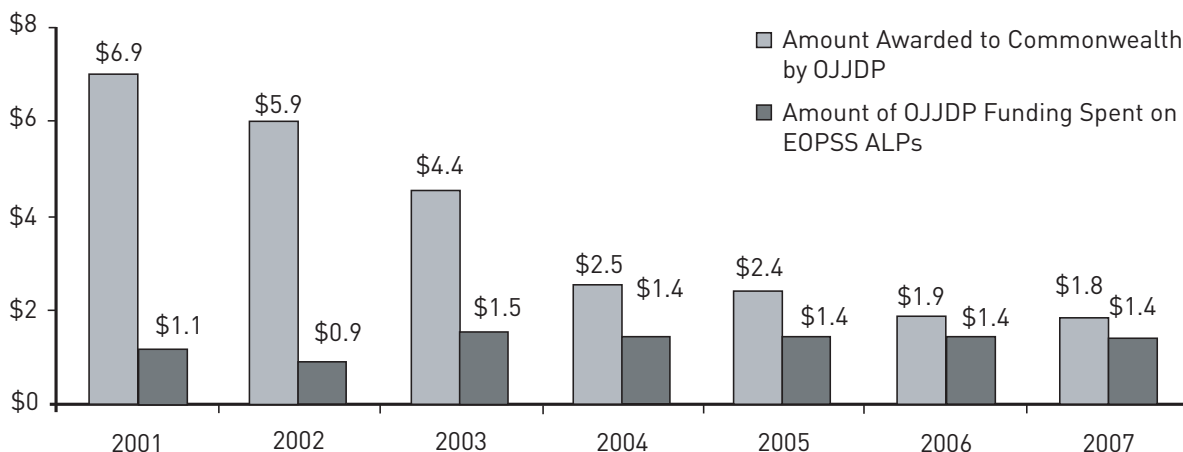

EOPSS finances its secure facilities with federal funds awarded to it by the federal Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) pursuant to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act and the Juvenile Accountability Block Grant (JABG) program. The Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act provides “formula grant” funds to states to develop programs to prevent delinquency, improve the juvenile justice system, deinstitutionalize status offenders, remove children from adult jails and reduce disproportionate minority confinement.⁵⁸ The JABG program provides funding for delinquency prevention, graduated sanctions, substance abuse, mental health screening and treatment, reentry and restorative justice programming.⁵⁹

The Commonwealth should not continue to rely on OJJDP federal funds to pay for secure ALPs. First, the amount of money OJJDP has made available to states has decreased significantly over the last eight years. In 2001, the Commonwealth received $6.9 million, 16% of which it spent on ALPs. In 2007, it received $1.8 million, 74% of which it spent on ALPs. If the Commonwealth’s federal award continues to decrease, it will not be able to sustain the secure ALPs.

Second, every federal dollar spent on a detention bed represents one less dollar that the Commonwealth can spend on programs to reduce detention and prevent recidivism. In prior years, the Commonwealth has used federal monies to fund aftercare/reentry programs, alternatives to secure detention, gender-specific services, disproportionate minority contact reduction programs, mental health services and substance abuse prevention programs in Boston, Brockton, Chelsea, Holyoke, Lowell, Lynn, New Bedford, Springfield and Worcester. As the amount of federal funding not earmarked for ALPs has declined, the Commonwealth has been able to finance fewer such programs.⁶¹

Third, the Juvenile Justice Delinquency and Prevention Act expressly prohibits the payment of formula grant funds to unlicensed residential programs.⁶² To the extent EOPSS uses Delinquency Prevention Act funds to finance the Essex and Bristol County ALPs, it is violating this prohibition.

In 2006, the Commonwealth's Juvenile Justice Advisory Committee wrote a letter to the Governor requesting that the Commonwealth assume the cost of the EOPSS ALPs and, in its 2007 annual report to the Governor and the Legislature, it recommended the same.⁶³ Neither the current nor the former Governor responded to the letter or the annual report. In late 2007, the JJAC voted to force the issue by refusing to allocate any federal funding for ALPs. In May 2008, at the request of Mary Elizabeth Heffernan, EOPSS's Undersecretary for Criminal Justice, the Committee reversed its decision. More recently, EOPSS reminded the Committee that it has only an advisory role over the JABG funds, and that if the Committee again refused to allocate federal funds for ALPs, EOPSS might allocate those funds itself.⁶⁴

X. Conclusions and Recommendations.

The Commonwealth must take control of the ALP program. At a minimum, it must:

- Articulate criteria for securely detaining youth prior to arraignment and in so doing, limit secure pre-arraignment detention to youth who are 14 years of age or older and at high risk of re-offending or failing to reappear in court if released;
- Educate police officers, probation officers and the Juvenile Court about the criteria and require probation officers to include in the Juvenile Court file of every youth they order securely detained a written statement setting forth the reasons for the detention;
- Delegate administration of all secure ALPs to the Massachusetts Department of Youth Services (DYS), the single state agency with experience in the detention of children and young people;
- Provide DYS with the state funding needed to administer facilities that are licensed by the Massachusetts Department of Early Education and Care and adhere to its regulations;
- Inform police departments that failure to provide youth with access to bail magistrates on a systemic basis will jeopardize their receipt of state funding and require police departments to maintain records demonstrating that they have provided such access;
- Consider opening the Juvenile Court in the evenings and on weekends in large metropolitan areas to arraign youth arrested during those time periods; and
- Take steps to reduce the overrepresentation of youth of color in secure ALPs by gathering and analyzing relevant data and including pre-arraignment detention in the Juvenile Detention Alternatives Initiative spearheaded by DYS.

² Section 67 of Chapter 119 of the Massachusetts General Law states in relevant part that:

[W]henver a child between seven and seventeen years of age is arrested with or without a warrant, . . . the officer in charge of the police station or town lockup to which the child has been taken shall immediately notify the probation officer of the district court, or of the juvenile court, if there is one, within whose judicial district such child was arrested and at least one of the child's parents, or, if there is no parent, the guardian or person with whom it is stated that such child resides, and shall inquire into the case. Pending such notice and inquiry, such child shall be detained. Upon the acceptance by the officer in charge of said police station or town lockup of the written promise of said parent, guardian or any other reputable person to be responsible for the presence of such child in court at the time and place when such child is to appear or upon the receipt of such officer in charge from said probation officer of a request for the release of such child to him, such child shall be released to said person giving such promise or to said probation officer making such request; provided, that, if the arresting officer requests in writing that a child between fourteen and seventeen years of age be detained, and if the court issuing a warrant for the arrest of a child between fourteen and seventeen years of age directs in the warrant that such child shall be held in safekeeping pending his appearance in court, or, if the probation officer shall so direct, such child shall be detained . . .

maining funding on lockup removal programs and training until it could demonstrate compliance. ⁷ In determining whether a child is at risk of flight, state law requires that a court consider the following factors: the nature of the offense with which the child is charged, the child's ties to his community and family, the child's employment history, his financial resources and his prior involvement, if any, with the juvenile justice system. Mass. Gen. Law ch. 276, § 58.

⁸ Before detaining a child on the ground that his release will endanger his community, a court must hold an evidentiary hearing at which the child, represented by counsel, may present evidence in support of his release. Mass. Gen. Law ch. 276, § 58A.
